

Albanian Dignity rally held in Tirana

September 28, 2025

In the central square of Tirana, the “Albanian Dignity” rally was held with wide participation of citizens. This action was a response to the insults of the leaders of the Rajavi cult and a support for Iranian mothers who are expecting their children.

Nejat Society Albania emphasized that the voice of families never dies, and no wall can divide the love between relatives.

On Friday, September 12, 2025, the Nejat Society Albania organized a grand social gathering in the central square of the city of Tehran under the title “Albanian Dignity”.

In this activity, which was accompanied by the distribution of brochures and friendly conversations, citizens participated with great enthusiasm.

This symbolic action was a clear response to the years of oppression and crimes of the MEK against the Iranian people; especially to the mothers who wait with a sad heart to see their children, spending their days and nights with longing and pain.

Maryam Rajavi's Ten-Point Plan and Internal Practices

September 9, 2025

As members of the MEK are reportedly subjected to forced religious rituals, forced hijab, forced dress code, forced celibacy, forced labor, forced self-criticism and gender separation, available evidence suggests that Maryam Rajavi does not fulfill her ten-point plan within her organization.

Numerous reports from former members, human rights organizations, and investigative journalists detail a highly authoritarian and cultic environment within the MEK, directly contradicting the democratic and human rights principles espoused in Rajavi's agenda.

In a quite brief review, it is detected that the practices stand in stark contrast to the principles of freedom of religion, freedom of choice, and gender equality outlined in ten-point plan, which advocates for a democratic, secular and non-nuclear Iran.

From Misjudged Intelligence to Endless Wars: A Call to Reassess US Strategy

September 22, 2025

If Washington intends to reduce the likelihood of open-ended commitments, it must reform how it evaluates threats, validates information, and calibrates the use of force.

For more than two decades, the United States has engaged in a series of military operations far from its borders. These interventions have generated mixed strategic outcomes, imposed significant fiscal burdens, and contributed to persistent instability in several regions. A recurring feature of this pattern is the elevation of partial, politicized, or externally sourced intelligence to the status of policy driver. If Washington intends to reduce the likelihood of open-ended commitments, it must reform how it evaluates threats, validates information, and calibrates the use of force.

MEK Rally Participation: Incentives and Recruitment of Vulnerable Population

September 28, 2025

The presence of black American protesters at Mujahedin-e Khalq (MEK) demonstrations outside the UN assembly building is the most recent show-off of the group's so-called public support.

The Afro-Americans have been photographed by the journalists outside the 80th session of the UN's General Assembly on September 23, 2025 in New York City. They are often bused to locations like New York City. Their presence is primarily attributed to financial incentives and recruitment through intermediaries.

Reports indicate that individuals, often from economically disadvantaged backgrounds, are offered payment, food, and transportation to attend these rallies, sometimes without full awareness of the MEK's background or agenda. Recruitment offers target vulnerable populations, leveraging their need for income.

The MEK, with a complex history of terrorist activities, cult-like nature and extremism including a period on the list of Foreign Terrorist Organizations (from 1997 to 2012), has been known to employ various tactics to bolster its public image and demonstrate support.

The group's strategy involves presenting a diverse appearance at its rallies to counter criticism of its limited internal support and to project an image of broad international backing.

MEK, a complex security challenge for Albania

Sept 3, 2025

The Mujahedin-e Khalq (MEK) is currently under criminal investigation in Albania for suspected cybercrime, inciting war, and other offenses, according to Balkan Insight. This comes after Albanian authorities conducted a raid on their Ashraf 3 camp in Manza, Durës, on June 20, 2023.

The investigation, led by Albania's Special Structure against Organized Crime and Corruption (SPAK), centers on allegations including "provocation of war," "unlawful interception of computer data," "interference with computer data," "interference with computer systems," and "misuse of devices". These offenses are suspected to have been committed within the framework of an "organized criminal group".

Michael Rubin: the MEK seek to deny or silence discussion about their inconsistency

September 8, 2025

The prominent American journalist and former Pentagon official, Michael Rubin asserts that, the Mujahedin-e Khalq (MEK) and its umbrella National Council of Resistance of Iran (NCRI) seek to deny or silence discussion about the inconsistency in their activities rather than explaining about it.

In reply to the MEK's representative, Ali Safavi's letter to Middle East Forum's editor, Rubin writes, "Organizations that prioritize ad hominem invective over dispassionate debate, do so because they understand they cannot win with facts".

Ali Safavi claims that Rubin persists in amplifying the narratives of the Iranian government against the MEK by criticizing the group in his articles including the one he published on July 7, 2025 commentary in the Middle East Forum Observer ("Iran's Mojahedin-e Khalq Organization Is Now Irrelevant. Will It Disband?").

Admitting the responsibility of what he wrote Rubin said, "Mr. Safavi is correct that I have criticized the Mujahedin-e Khalq on several occasions based on its history, behavior, and opacity." However, Rubin properly notified that rather than acknowledge its choices the MEK, often deflects with ad hominem attacks.

"If the Mojahedin-e Khalq and its various proxies have nothing to hide, they should welcome transparency rather than criticize it," he added.
